Rather than follow in her parents' footsteps into law, Clare Hetherington instead chose to study music at Oxford. After a few years working for a concert venue, however, she decided that she wanted to 'really challenge myself, properly test my brain'.

She took annual leave to do internships at different law firms ('I used that a lot in early interviews to prove my dedication') and got a training contract in 2014 at Payne Hicks Beach. Private client work struck her immediately as the area she wanted to be in: 'It's a mix of rigorous analysis and attention to detail, combined with interacting with a range of clients from all over the world and adapting your advice to suit them.'
